Machado remembered for Native Hawaiian advocacy

Former OHA trustee died Monday after decadeslong career in public service

By COLLEEN UECHI

Friends of former Office of Hawaiian Affairs Trustee Colette Machado will tell you she was the classic local aunty — the kind with a big heart who could turn tough when it came to fight for a cause.

"She could take a punch and she could throw a punch, but always for the full purpose of justice for the people and to protect the land," said Stacy Helm Crivello, who worked with Machado while the two Molokai women were serving in the public sector and grew to be friends.

"Of all the leaders of our generation, she was a tita," said longtime Molokai physician Dr. Noa Emmett Aluli, who described Machado of his best friend of more than 40 years. "And she demanded not just respect, but that you do the best work and you take care of your families at the same time."

The 71-year-old Machado died Monday at Queen's Medical Center on Oahu after being hospitalized since January, Aluli said. Friends and colleagues of the longtime community activist and OHA trustee remembered her decades in public service and passion for Native Hawaiian causes.

Machado was first elected to the OHA board in 1996 and spent 24 years with the agency before being ousted by Luana Alapa in the 2020 elections.

But long before that, she was stepping into the ring over issues that included the U.S. Navy's bombing of Kahoolawe, Aluli recalled.

When the doctor came to Molokai in 1976, the movement to protect Kahoolawe was heating up. Aluli was one of the "Kahoolawe Nine," the first group of protesters to land on the island on Jan. 4, 1976
